INTERESTS

I specialize in undergraduate teaching at the honors and general level. My interests center on the institution of the American family, which has changed dramatically in the last 50 years, continues to change, and is a cornerstone of the survival and 200,000 years of evolution of our species, the development of complex groups and societies, and the well-being for adults, children, and society today. My interests include marital quality, divorce and stepfamilies, and parent/child relationships. I have developed and delivered an online course on the Sociology of the Family and several other classes related family. I teach small honors courses and particularly enjoy teaching large, general undergraduate courses on the American family. I also advise and teach the select group of students in the honors program in Sociology and Criminology.

My aim in teaching is to introduce students to inter-disciplinary research ideas that can help them understand the essential nature of family relationships in human evolution and history, and to navigate their unique, liminal position with relation to family and the life course. Most of my undergraduates are located in the life course space between their families of origin and the families they have yet to create, and they have many questions and concerns. My hope is that ideas and research discussed in my courses can help them make sense of their past, enrich and improve their present family relationships, and give them food for thought as they develop a vision for the families they hope to create. Topics focus in key aspects of the life course including, the biological and social importance of families, familial and romantic love, hooking up and sexual behavior choices, cohabitation, marriage, parenting, divorce and stepfamilies, and normative and non-normative family stressors and family resilience and thriving in the face of challenges.
